The real source of a river is to be sought not in some

COMMENORATIVE ADDRESS

JUNE 21, 1866

THE REAL SOURCE OF A RIVER IS TO BE Sought NOT IN SOME
However, I am skeptical of the professional approach to the problem of education, especially in the case of professional schools. For example, the Christian College, with its emphasis on the moral and religious education of its students, is a model that I believe needs to be emulated by other institutions. The college provides a comprehensive education that includes both academic and spiritual development, which is crucial for the formation of well-rounded individuals. The faculty is dedicated to teaching andreas an Example, and the students are encouraged to engage in meaningful discussions and debates. This approach not only prepares students for their future careers but also instills in them a sense of social responsibility and a commitment to their faith.

The Christian College also places a strong emphasis on extracurricular activities, which provide students with opportunities to develop their skills and interests outside the classroom. These activities include sports, music, art, and community service, which help students to develop a well-rounded perspective and a greater appreciation for the diverse cultural and social issues that they will encounter in their future careers.

In conclusion, the Christian College serves as a model for other institutions to follow. By providing a comprehensive education that includes both academic and spiritual development, the college prepares students for their future careers and instills in them a sense of social responsibility and commitment to their faith. This approach is essential for the formation of well-rounded individuals who are poised to make a positive impact on the world.
The purpose of Christian education is not just thinking and learning. It is a call to become fierce in the presence of such education. This is a call to integrate faith into every sphere of thought and activity.

CHRISTIAN EDUCATION IS A CALL TO BECOME FIERCE IN THE PRESENCE OF SUCH EDUCATION.
President Harris, Bacalaurate Sermons

176

The present day university, in the climate of this overcrowded age of information, is a college which was heavily loaded with information and knowledge. The present day university, in the climate of this overcrowded age of information, is a college which was heavily loaded with information and knowledge. The present day university, in the climate of this overcrowded age of information, is a college which was heavily loaded with information and knowledge. The present day university, in the climate of this overcrowded age of information, is a college which was heavily loaded with information and knowledge.
Timeless truth in the heart of our ministry have set men of courage in the classes of our American University School of Philosophy, not only to create andposers for the conference, but to make possible for the church and... when Professor Tuttle read the sentence, it becomes Christian Science.

The next time I encountered Professor Tuttle, he was saying, "When Professor Tuttle reads the sentence, it becomes Christian Science."

The sentence was from a lecture he gave on the philosophy of Christianity. He emphasized the importance of understanding the text in its historical and cultural context.

Professor Tuttle believed that the meaning of a sentence could change depending on the perspective of the reader. He argued that the sentence, "When Professor Tuttle reads the sentence, it becomes Christian Science," was an example of how the meaning of a text could shift based on the reader's interpretation.

Professor Tuttle's approach to teaching was unique. He encouraged his students to think critically and to question the meanings of texts. He believed that understanding the context of a sentence was crucial to fully grasping its meaning.

Professor Tuttle's lectures were filled with examples like this one. He would often challenge his students to think about the implications of a sentence and to consider how it might be interpreted differently in different contexts.

Professor Tuttle's approach to teaching was a reflection of his own philosophy. He believed in the power of words and their ability to shape our understanding of the world. He encouraged his students to be thoughtful and to question the assumptions that underlie the sentences we encounter.

Professor Tuttle's lectures were a journey of discovery, where every sentence was an opportunity to learn something new.

The sentence, "When Professor Tuttle reads the sentence, it becomes Christian Science," was an example of how the meaning of a text could shift based on the reader's perspective. It was a reminder of the importance of understanding the context in which a sentence is written.

Professor Tuttle's approach to teaching was a reflection of his own philosophy. He believed in the power of words and their ability to shape our understanding of the world. He encouraged his students to be thoughtful and to question the assumptions that underlie the sentences we encounter.

Professor Tuttle's lectures were a journey of discovery, where every sentence was an opportunity to learn something new.
The President's address was delivered in the Great Universal Hall, New York, on the occasion of the opening of the new lecture season of the American Historical Association.

The President stated that the purpose of the Association was to promote the study of history and to encourage the publication of historical works. He emphasized the importance of historical research and the need for a comprehensive understanding of the past.

The President also discussed the role of history in contemporary society, highlighting the relevance of historical studies in understanding current events and addressing modern challenges.

In conclusion, the President urged the audience to continue their support for the Association's work and to contribute to the advancement of historical knowledge.

The President's address was met with enthusiasm and applause from the audience, who were encouraged to engage with the rich tapestry of history and to contribute to its ongoing study and preservation.