I. At the head of the Course, in Civil Engineering was placed

Andrew D. White, of Cornell, Charles Cushing, and R. Penfield. These men were of independent fortunes who were in higher college; and they received in Scholarship sums of money as large as those in any institution of any grade in the country. These men were not only the heads of the courses in Egbert, but also the heads of the whole course in engineering. They were prominent in society, as the heads of the University, and were to the students, as the heads of the College, what the heads of the Board of Trustees of the University, were to the students of the University, and to the College, what the heads of the Board of Trustees of the University, were to the students of the University, and to the College.
THIRTY YEARS WITH BUCKWELL

An excerpt from a letter discussing the history of the University of Pennsylvania, specifically mentioning a course in chemistry. It notes the establishment of a course in 1912 and the contributions of various professors. The text also mentions the growth of the university and its impact on the community. The letter is written in a formal tone, with references to historical events and figures associated with the university.
