DANGEROUS DRINKING

High-risk drinking invites serious consequences, including permanent criminal records, revoked driver’s licenses and even expulsion from Bucknell. But that is not the gravest danger.

One week into this semester, already eight students have been transported to the emergency room with blood-alcohol levels that ranged from .22 to .35 — which is potentially deadly. While we know much of that consumption occurred off campus, the risk to the students involved is the same no matter where it occurs.

Last year, several college students in Pennsylvania died from drinking too much. We must not let that tragedy happen here.
If you choose to drink, please do so responsibly.

Look out for one another. Those engaged in heavy drinking need no one more than they need a good friend to let them know to stop, and to help them in case they drink too much to care for themselves. If you see someone in danger, call 911. Far better, though: don’t let it get to that point.

To learn more, visit www.bucknell.edu/playsmart for important information, and tell us how we can help you and other students make good decisions by writing wecandobetter@bucknell.edu.

The University Administration